after having traveled five hundred miles to reach Hamburg, yielded thirty-three and a half quarts of milk in one day, which gave thirty-one pounds thirteen ounces of butter. The following extract gives his mode of treatment of cows and calves, for which he was distinguished:

"The new born calf is sprinkled with meal and laid before the cow, which latter remains chained to her post, which then licks the calf all over. The calf is then taken away from the cow, and brought back to sucking only three times a day, at milking time. So the calf requires from the first the habit of regular meals punctually given. After the calf has done sucking, the cow is stipped clean. In other cases part of the milk is first taken, and then the last milk allowed to the calf. Which of these two modes is adopted depends upon the yield of milk and its richness. I once lost a valuable calf by allowing him the last milk, this containing too

"At the age of three weeks, the calves are removed to a calf-stable, and there receive a drink three times a day, at the same time they used to suck; in the meantime they are allowed hay. The first peculiarity now of my mode of feeding is this, that into the drink of the calves I mix a great deal of linseed. Another point of high importance is to take prevention against diarrhea. Now looseness of the bowels originates in most cases from acid formed in their stomach. I therefore suspend between every two calves a piece of chalk. Sometimes a calf will not touch the chalk for months; at other times they will cat up the whole piece in a few days. I also shear all my cows and calves. One girl will shear two cows or four calves in a day. The shearing helps to keep the skin clean, and greatly increases both comfort and appetite of the animal.

cians will prescribe fennel tea to women lying-in; this induced me to try fennel-tea also on my cows. Upon one ounce of fennel I poured three-quarters of a quart of boiling water, let it stand five minutes on a hot plate, then strained it, and gave it to the cow luke-warm. The cows are not all fond of this drink; I therefore sweeten it and give it out of a bottle. I give this drink immediately after calving, three times a day for two days, or six times in all. I give the same drink thereafter once a month; in case of costiveness I give it oftener, with the best success.

"It is of great importance to allow milch cows a sufficiency of fatty matter in their feed always. I prefer linseed to any other ingredient."
